In a workshop dedicated to jewelry making, you will enter a space where material takes shape through gesture. Among artisan tools and natural materials, you will be guided in discovering the lost-wax technique, giving form to an object designed and built by you.

An experience that combines experimentation and precision, allowing room for your interpretation.

You will begin by working with moldable wax, exploring shapes, volumes, and textures. You can integrate natural elements, such as threads or leaves, to create a personal composition. During the process, you will define your project, choosing which creation to transform into metal and the final material among bronze, brass, or silver.

As the work takes shape, each choice becomes more conscious, and the project clarifies.
And at some point, you're no longer just molding, but you're building something you recognize as your own.
